As the Robert A.M. Stern Architects-designed 70 Vestry nears completion in Tribeca, developer Related Companies has offered us a first look inside the über-pricey condo building, that will be the future home of Tom Brady and Gisele Bündchen.

The first look comes in the form of a model residence at the 14-story building, which features interiors by Daniel Romauldez. Located on the fourth floor of the building, the apartment measures 2,445 square feet, and is currently on the market for $8.495 million.

The condo comes with three bedrooms, and three and a half bathrooms. One of the standout spaces in the apartment is the windowed, eat-in kitchen. It comes with a large marble kitchen island, and marble countertops, custom oak cabinetry designed by Romauldez, and a range of appliances by Miele including a steam oven and a built-in coffee/espresso machine.

The master bedroom here comes with two large walk-in closets, and all three bedrooms here have have ensuite bathrooms.

70 Vestry has been one of the fastest-selling new condo buildings in the city; only a handful of its 46 apartments remain. The ones available on StreetEasy range in price from $7.95 million to $23.5 million. A $50 million and $65 million penthouse at 70 Vestry are in contract, and if the latter closes close to its asking price, it could shatter the Downtown Manhattan record held by the three-story penthouse at the High Line's Getty condo.
